better keep some of it and buy herself a new hat.

But Juliet did not want a new hat. She always had an old one that would do. So long as her clothes were comfortable and clean she thought nothing about them. The changing fashions did not interest her. When small sleeves came in she went on wearing large ones as long as her waists lasted. It was the same way with skirts. She went about with six times too much cloth in her skirt, when everybody else was wearing hobbles. And nobody ever said one word to her about it. She was Juliet, and whatever she did was right at Westmore. more.

The truth was Juliet lived so much outside of herself that she had no time to dwell upon her own feelings or appearance. She had begun by doing this purposely, and it had become a habit. Long ago she had found that if she were to be even moderately happy she must forget herself. And the only way to forget herself was to remember others.

took Juliet in hand. She told her a lot of things. She showed her a lot of things. She showed her that it was sinful for a woman who was only thirty-four and good looking to hamper herself with such an appearance, especially when she had money.

"I know you're beautiful inside, dear," she ended, tenderly, "but strangers judge one entirely by appearance. I'm planning to have you meet a let of COLUMN TO

Juliet Gale cared nothing at all for her looks. She never had. As a little girl she had not cared to imitate her schoolmates in such matters as bright hair ribbons and ruffied pinafore; as a young woman she had not the slightest desire to throw out engaging her hair and buttering blue sash ends; little feelers toward men by curling her hair and buttering blue sash ends; as a woman of thirty-four she was as a woman of thirty-four she was content to wear anything that came handy, without regard to public opinion.

Juliet had lived in Westmore all her life, in one house, a nice old-fashioned house, with a big yard and two or three stately maples. She had been an only child, and when her parents died she was left alone. But as she had much money she lived on in the old house and managed to be tolerably content. She had many friends, and they did not allow her to get lonesome. Then, too, she was always very busy with church and charitable work. Juliet gave away a great deal of money. Some people there were work at the proposed and provides. Her complexion had no shine now, for she had grown to love rice powder, and her hair was fluffed out in one of the dozen ways fashionable just then. powder, and her hair was fluffed out in one of the dozen ways fashionable just then. She looked so lovely that a good many people couldn't believe that she was Juliet Gale at all.

After service Richard Culver walked home with her. And from that day he never ceased to be devoted to her. They were married the spring following. Juliet made a beautiful bride. She had flowers and wore a longer train than any girl who had ever been married in Westmore. But, then, no girl was ever so happy as she.

"PAINLESS EDUCATION."

Learning the Problems Before Memorizing the Rules.

Attention of teachers now is being alled to "painless education." A moth er writing in one of the current magazines tells how her daughter, now at the age of twelve, has achieved a cer-tain "natural education." The little girl speaks a number of languages, she is well along in mathematics, having mastered both algebra and geometry, and has never taken them as studies in the sense that they are studied in the high schools. The little girl learned without knowing that she was learned without knowing that she was learning.

For example, instruction was given in addition in the course of shelling peas. The game was to find how many peas there were in two pods. The two pods had to be added. Dice were added to the game and the little girl soon became an expert in adding the number of spots on them.

In the matter of subtraction tin soldiers and marbles were used, and whenever a cannon shot toppled over a number of soldiers the child soon was able to tell how many were left standing. There were no quizzes and the child was taught to get results without the use of rules. The funny doings of "Mr. X" interested her in algebra. Cardboard and scissors started her in geometry. She was able to demonstrate that the square on the hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle is equal to the sum of the squares on the other sides before she ever had heard of the rule. In other words, she learned things by doing them at play. Instead of having to memorize rules, she did the problem and learned the rule afterward, if she ever learned it. Many a rule has been glibly recited by a child with no idea of what it was about. Certain verbs "take the dative after the analogy of their primitives." The rule might as well have been in the original Latin, so far as ability of the average student to comprehend it. The world in education as in other things is moving along new and better lines.
